Northwestern PROFESSIONAL STUDIES

ONE REASON WOMEN AREN'T GETTING THE PROMOTION: THEY DON'T WANT IT

omen are underrepresented in leadership positions for plenty of reasons: They're stereotyped as being less competent than men, they aren't as aggressive, and there's a perception that they can't lead and raise a family at the same time.

Now, research from Harvard Business School adds yet another reason to the list: Women aren't in leadership positions because they just don't want the jobs as much as men do.

The paper, published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, incorporates nine studies conducted on various highachieving groups. Combined, the research indicates that women value power less than men do, and the studies try to explain the phenomenon.

In one of the studies, conducted on 650 recent MBA graduates, researchers had participants rank their current position in their industry, their ideal position and the highest position they could realistically attain. Women had no doubt they could "realistically attain" the same level of success as men, but they listed lower ideal positions.

Another one of the studies helps explain that finding, by suggesting women have more negative associations with power than men do.

"Women expect more stress, burden, conflicts, and difficult trade-offs to accompany high-level positions," said Alison Wood Brooks, a co-author of the paper and an assistant professor of business administration at Harvard.

One explanation for why power stresses women out: They have less time in which to attain a greater number of goals. In another of the nine studies, researchers asked about 800 working adults to rank their goals, defined as "things that occupy your thoughts on a routine basis, things that you deeply care about, or things that motivate your behavior and decisions." The women surveyed not only listed more goals, but a smaller proportion of those goals were related to achieving power.

"Right now, it is likely that women have more goals in life because pursuing career and family goals simultaneously is a relatively new concept for women," Brooks added. In other words, women feel more inclined to have it all than men, who listed fewer personal goals, and that means making compromises somewhere.

"I hope these findings will lead people and managers to ask [workers their preferences]," said Francesca Gino, another co-author of the paper. "Some women may deeply care about power, some may not. Some may see too many negatives. For the latter category, talking may lead to identifying opportunities that remove some of those negatives."

I've got mixed feelings on #ShoutYourAbortion

Nikki Lvnette

⊗NikkiLynette

Last week. #ShoutYourAbortion trended online for a full day. People pissed off about the pro-life folks' fight to take funding away from Planned Parenthood created the hashtag to encourage women to share their abortion stories publicly.

Despite criticism, threats and merciless amounts of trolling, multitudes of women who have had terminated pregnancies used the #ShoutYour Abortion hashtag to share their experiences and show solidarity with a woman's right to choose. I consider myself to be pro-choice—I think it's creepy for the government to try to control what a woman does with her reproductive system.

In spite of that sentiment, though, I'm not sure how I feel about hashtagging abortion. As outspoken and unconventional and artsy as I might be, even I have mixed emotions about whether this type of activism is needed. After all, isn't the pro-choice fight all about accepting that a woman has a right to make a personal decision for her own body? Doesn't tweeting about your reproductive history take away the part of it that is personal? I'm sorry, but I had a hard time seeing abortion stories in 140 characters or less. Just saying,

And don't get me wrong, I definitely see how the #ShoutYourAbortion hashtag might have helped break down abortion stigma.

Talking about it publicly shows that plenty of women from all walks of life have had abortions, proving that many normal chicks have opted to end pregnancies for many different reasons.

However, not sharing your story doesn't mean you are ashamed or regretful. The decision to become a mother or not is one of the most private decisions a woman will ever make, and not only does she deserve the right to do with her body what she sees fit, she also has the right to have her decision remain

That's why I think all the drama over abortion rights is hella insulting.

It is ridiculous that the fight for women's health is so controversial, as if our gender inherently makes our bodies a subject for public political debate. And the fact that there are idiots in the world who think it's OK to threaten a woman's life because of her choice to end her pregnancy shows you that the pro-life folks need to teach their own supporters to respect life before they try to tell an entire country full of women what to do. Seriously, bruh. Back up off my ovaries.

Although online activism is no longer a new thing and it helps us bring major issues to light all the time, I think it's kinda awful that in 2015, the fight for a woman's reproductive rights is such a struggle that we are compelled to publicly disclose intimate details of our lives just to raise awareness. I understand why so many women are passionate about the abortion rights cause. But no woman should have to trade her privacy to show her solidarity.

CHICAGO AMONG THE WORST CITIES FOR PET LOVERS: STUDY

By Cristina Merrill | FOR REDEYE

Chicago is not exactly a friend to animal owners, according to a study of the 100 most populated cities in the U.S.

According to a WalletHub study, Chicago ranks as one of the worst cities in the U.S. for pet lovers. The study took in factors such as the number of veterinarians, pet businesses, dog parks and animal shelters per 100,000 residents in different cities to come up with the rankings. Cincinnati was ranked the best city in the U.S., with Newark, N.J., right at the bottom.

Chicago was only slightly better than Newark, coming in at 94. Local pet lovers and pet experts are divided on the results.

Realtor Larissa Brodsky is inclined to agree with the findings. Earlier this month at Lake Shore Park, where dogs frequently play unleashed, the Streeterville resident lamented that there are not more places for her to take her black English cocker spaniel, Nell.

"There is no place to take a dog out," she said. "Everywhere there are signs [that say] 'No dogs,' 'No dogs,' and I think it's not fair to people who pay property tax or who pay high rent and live in downtown Chicago." Brodsky likes shopping at stores that allow dogs, such as Neiman Marcus, and said dogs need big spaces in which to run around.

"They have to run," she said. "They cannot only walk or sleep."

However, Collin Creach, who works in software and recently moved to Chicago from Florida with his fiancée and their rescue dog, a lab and shepherd mix named Penny, had nothing but nice things to say about the Windy City.

"We've found it to be a very pet-friendly city even before we lived here, just seeing dogs around kind of was part of the compelling reason of wanting to live in the city in a place like Streeterville," he said.

Creach, 25, and his fiancée enjoy taking Penny to Lake Shore Park and respect how there are "nicely groomed grass areas" along Lake Shore Drive that prohibit dogs.

"We follow rules, so it's not a big deal," he said. "But places like [Lake Shore Park], we just pick up after our dog, we always bring bags, so I feel like as long as you're not making an exception to the rule, then you're not really standing out having a pet here."

Blair Neal-Fabian, who works in advertising and lives in Wicker Park with her husband and their female dog, Bailey, doesn't think Chicago is a horrible place to have a pet, but she does wish there were more green areas in her neighborhood and in the city in general.

"She's a rescue dog, so she's kind of temperamental with who she's around and stuff, so she probably doesn't make it out to as many public places as some other dogs, but there's not really any grass here," Neal-Fabian, 32, said from the front of her home, where she sat chatting with her husband while Bailey sat close by. "Even if you're going to walk your dog around the block, I mean, it's cement. I know it's kind of hard to do in a super condensed area, but it's very hard to find just a grassy spot for your dog, and dogs love grass."

The Chicago Park District does not agree with the survey results. According to CPD spokeswoman Zvezdana Kubat, there are 23 so-called Dog Friendly Areas in Chicago.

"We disagree with the results of this survey, as the Chicago Park District recognizes the importance of dog friendly areas (DFAs) in our parks, as they provide safe places for dogs to exercise, play and socialize," Kubat said in an email. "Currently, there are nearly two dozen DFAs in Chicago and the number of DFAs has increased each year for the past ten years. Furthermore, the Park District has supported the development of these areas based on community input and request."

health care & wellness.

Marcia Coburn, president of the Red Door Animal Shelter, finds it "a little shocking and very disappointing that Chicago, which is such an urbane and sophisticated city in so many ways, would be so low in something like this."

When pet owners come to Red Door and say they cannot take care of their animal, the issue they have can depend on the type of animal.

"I think with cats and dogs sometimes it's the fact that people need to move and often they can't find a new place, a rental, that will allow their pet to come with them and they don't also maybe particularly prioritize that," she said, adding that "we hear that more and more, that it's more and more difficult to find rental properties that will allow animals, particularly dogs, bigger dogs, over 20 pounds."

Coburn is particularly concerned about the welfare of pet rabbits, and said that the problem with rabbits is that the owners just don't understand their needs.

"They're just kind of considered, unfortunately, disposable pets, and they don't make noise like cats or dogs and so they're kind of the silent victim here," Coburn said.

Anna Morrison-Ricordati, a lawyer who works on cases involving animals, said via email that the biggest challenge for Chicago pet owners is knowing the laws that apply. She noted that Chicago is not the worst city on the list and that it may have the "greatest hope for improvement."

She wrote that Illinois and Cook County animal protection laws, such as anti-dog fighting laws and anti-cruelty laws, are some of the best in the country. She also praised the quality and availability of pet-related services and animal shelters.

"With a better understanding of the City Codes (and perhaps some revision), Chicago might someday be one of the most animal friendly cities in the US!" she wrote in an email.

Michael San Filippo, a spokesman for the American Veterinary Medical Association, whose headquarters are in Schaumburg, thinks Chicago is a good city for pets and their owners.

"From what I've seen, Chicago is a great place to have a pet," San Filippo said in an email. "I think business owners and government officials in Chicago, like most large cities, recognize the bond people have with their pets and want to create an environment where pets are welcome. That means more pet-friendly restaurants and workplaces, dog parks and green space, and other attractions and resources developed with pets and their people in mind."

Matt Nordloh, 55, lives in Dearborn Park with his dogs Scooter and Lucy, a bichon frise and a Boston rat terrier, respectively. He has had a "very positive" experience as a dog owner in Chicago and thinks his area is pet-friendly. He noted that he lives near Lake Michigan and within walking distance of parks.

"I don't see where it's unfriendly for dogs whatsoever," he said.

Traci Thibodeaux, an education consultant who lives in Printer's Row with her male black Labrador, Trey, is also happy. She did admit that apartment-hunting was not easy when she first moved to Chicago from Dallas three years ago. She found many buildings that accepted dogs, but the dogs had to be on the smaller side, and Trey weighs more than 70 pounds.

"That really reduced the options I had," she

She feels that Chicago is a pet-friendly city. "I feel accepted everywhere," Thibodeaux,

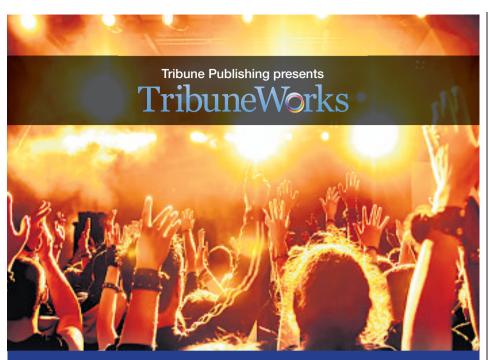

35, said. "I can take him into some restaurants, and there are a lot of pet services available here, so I think it's a good city."

The cost of having a pet in Chicago is not a concern for Thibodeaux, but she has had issues with dog-walking services.

"I would say it's kind of hard to find a good, reliable dog walker in the city," she said. "There's a lot of people that offer services, but in my three years I've had trouble with a lot of them. But the prices are on average, I think, comparable to other cities. I moved up from Dallas and the cost of walking a dog is about the same."

Like so many pet owners, Thibodeaux cannot imagine life without her furry friend, and moving to Chicago without Trey would have been undoable.

"A majority of his life—I've had him for II years—we were in Texas, and if there was any idea that moving to Chicago I couldn't have him, I wouldn't have moved to Chicago," she said. CRISTINA MERRILL IS A REDEYE CONTRIBUTOR.

FBI aims at better data collection

The FBI will begin collecting and providing to the public more information about police shootings of civilians, FBI Director James Comey said Monday as the agency released annual data on crime nationwide.

As part of its Uniform Crime Reporting program, the FBI tracks the number of police officers who are slain, as well as the number of justifiable homicides by police that are reported by law enforcement agencies. But those data are known to be incomplete since it is voluntary for police departments to feed data into the FBI's system, and little more than a third of local agencies do it, Comey said.

Comey on Monday encouraged every agency to submit the data to give the public a more complete picture of crime. He said the FBI also intends to collect more details about both fatal and nonfatal shootings by police of civilians, including the facts and circumstances of each incident and who was involved.

Once the information is collected, the FBI will produce a special publication chronicling police use of force. ASSOCIATED PRESS

Wingsuit pros streak through the sky at 200 mph

By Ryan Smith | FOR REDEYE

oe Ridler's colorblindness prevented him from fulfilling his childhood dream of piloting a fighter jet like Tom Cruise in "Top Gun," but now he's got the next best thing.

For the past two years, he's been routinely jumping out of planes while wearing a wingsuit, a high-tech device that turns his body into a makeshift aircraft capable of high-altitude stunts Batman could only dream of.

"I found this and it's helped bring my dream of flight back in life," said Ridler, a 35-year-old Pilsen resident. "To fly around the sky without an engine or anything beneath it is like nothing else."

Ridler is just one of dozens of skilled skydivers from all over the country converging at Chicagoland Skydiving Center in nearby Rochelle, Ill., this week to take flight in the first National Championships of Wingsuit Flying.

The puffy suits certainly don't look like much when they're earthbound. Travis Mickle looked ridiculous walking around in his cherry-red wingsuit while gearing up with his three-man Wicked Wingsuit team for a practice jump recently. It was as if he were wearing a Snuggie crossed with a camping tent.

But after being dropped out of a small plane from 14,000 feet, his suit inflated and transformed him into a human glider who sped horizontally through the Illinois sky at speeds reaching nearly 200 mph.

"My ex-girlfriend got me into it, and I didn't enjoy at first, especially since I'm a little heavier. But now I can't get enough of it," said Mickle, 29, who now works as a professional wingsuiter and lives onsite at the Rochelle airport. "Clouds are my favorite thing because you can fly around them and it gives you a reference for how fast you're going. You really feel like you're an airplane."

But not even the most nimble of airplanes have the dexterity and control of wingsuit pros. They can gently glide or zip across the sky and perform front flips—all during the same jump.

"Imagine being on a roller coaster without the rails and restriction," Ridler said. "Think of the suit as an energy retention device. You can change your body position and harness that potential energy to do all sorts of things."

During the Performance half of this week's championships, participants must contort their bodies to achieve three goals; there are separate jumps for longest flight, farthest distance and fastest horizontal speed. GPS units plugged into their helmets record precise data and tell judges how fast they're going and how far they've gone.

The Acrobatic discipline of the championships asks teams of two flyers to perform various formations and tricks while a videographer captures the footage to play for judges. The winners will be crowned national champions and qualify for a future world championship.

The creation of an annual competition by a governing body (the United States Parachute Association) is further proof of the skyrocketing popularity of the still-young sport of wingsuit flying, which was first developed commercially in 1999.

of Wingsuit Flying
When: Tuesday-Sunday
Where: Chicagoland Skydiving Center "Wingsuit flying is the fastest-growing discipline in skydiving right Admission: Free now," said Nancy Koreen, director of sport promotion for the USPA. "Skydiving has always been a cutting-edge aerial sport, and this is just another example of skydiving pushing the limits of human flight."

Sometimes those limits are pushed even further. A segment of extreme wingsuit fliers engage in illegal terrain flying, or the art of gliding in close proximity to cliffs or tree lines at speeds exceeding 150 mph, often while wearing helmets equipped with cameras.

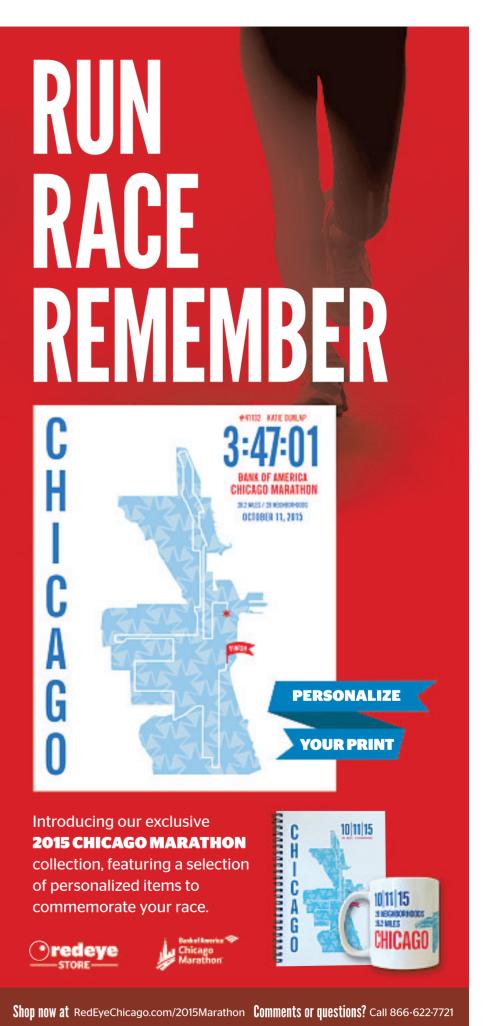

The footage of some of these dangerous stunts racks up millions of YouTube views, which has in turn encouraged more daredevil stunts. Two dozen wingsuiters died in 2014, according to one unofficial count, a number that has steadily increased as more people are attracted to the sport. Two famous fliers-Dean Potter and Graham Hunt-were killed in a wingsuit accident in Yosemite National Park in May.

> Ridler said he's lost friends to terrain-flying crashes.

"The injuries you get doing that, you die. There is no second life," he said. "That's a problem in that discipline because people want to get the closest without dying."

The brand of wingsuit flying on display at the National Championships of Wingsuit Flying is much safer. In Mickle's hundreds of jumps, the worst injury he's received is a burn on his leg from hitting the grass too fast.

"You're adding a suit to the mix, and every time you add another piece of equipment, you're adding another complication," he said. "But we're taking extra precautions to make sure it's safe." RYAN SMITH IS A REDEYE CONTRIBUTOR. @RYANSMITHWRITER

QB had to trip, or Clara is only dating Russell Wilson so her curse is limited to just one player.	They're saving them up for next season. #TankDaSeason	Wilson isn't getting sacked by Ciara, so someone had to do it!	It's a marathon, not a race. And also football.
4	Brent Seabrook's new Blackhawks contract is	CHA-CHING!	a good deal, but damn that salary cap.	Let me channel my inner Trump: 'IT'S HUGET	a welcome distraction from Patrick Kane's situation.	paper, probably.
5	What's your favorite Joe Maddon-ism?	I like that thing where he took a struggling baseball franchise and turned it around. That was cool.	"The word 'party' has taken on a negative connotation in our country these days. It's really bumming me out."	"Bartender? Barkeep? I've got the first round." You gotta love Of Joe!	"We are good." Is that his? Either way it's hilarious!	"Hey, anyone seen my glasses?"

Rose: 'I will be proven innocent'

By K.C. Johnson | CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Change the coach. Give the budding, firsttime All-Star a max contract. Watch the possible Hall of Fame veteran turn in a dominant international performance.

The Bulls did all of that and more over the offseason, which ended with Monday's media day and start of training camp with practice set for Tuesday. But as per usual, the spotlight eventually will find its way to Derrick Rose.

Rose, speaking publicly for the first time since last month's civil suit alleged he and two friends sexually assaulted Rose's former girlfriend, enjoyed his first summer of workouts rather than rehabilitation since 2011.

"I will be proven innocent," Rose said, "It's not true. ... This whole summer I had tunnel vision. My mindset was just working out every day and spending as much time as possible with

"I think my case scared everybody in the league probably. I hope it got everybody's attention. The only thing you can do now is

Bulls general manager Gar Forman added: "We understand there's a process that he has to go through. Derrick is part of our family. He has our full support."

The Bulls replaced Tom Thibodeau with Fred Hoiberg, paid Jimmy Butler $95 million over five years and admired Pau Gasol's virtuoso performance at this month's EuroBasket tournament.

The team opens the preseason Oct. 6 and the regular season Oct. 27.

It's not you, Jared, it's them

Jared Allen's days as a Bear appear to be over. The Tribune has confirmed that the defensive lineman has been traded to Carolina in exchange for a conditional draft pick. Fox's Jay Glazer, a close friend of Allen's, originally

Allen, who was asked to play linebacker when the Bears shifted to a 3-4 defensive system last spring, was without a sack through the first three games.

The Bears originally signed Allen in March 2014, giving him a four-year, $32 million deal in which $15.5 million was guaranteed.

Tuesday's must-see event in sports

Cubs at Cincinnati | 6:10 p.m. CSN

The Cubs are in the playoffs. The Cubs are in the playoffs. The Cubs are in the playoffs. That's really fun to say, and there's nothing the Reds can do about it.

TODAY IN THE YEAR...

1901: Enrico Fermi, who helped develop America's first atomic weapons, was born in Rome. 1918: Allied forces scored a decisive breakthrough of the Hindenburg Line during World War I. 1979: Pope John Paul II became the first pope to visit Ireland as he arrived for a three-day tour. 1982: The first of seven people in the Chicago area died after unwittingly taking Extra-Strength Tylenol capsules laced with cyanide. (The crime remains unsolved.)

1987: Henry Ford II, longtime chairman of Ford Motor Co., died in Detroit; he was 70.

THE QUOTE

"Like I said. you don't need to go to church to be a Christian. If you go to Taco Bell, that doesn't make you a taco.

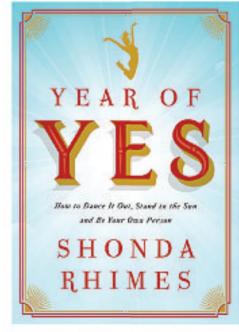

-Justin Bieber, to Complex, while talking about his views on religion and his own faith. We're pretty sure this is the best metaphor about religion ever.

#PrayforFetty

That'll be one broken leg and three tickets. Fetty Wap, the genius behind "Trap Queen," was trying to pass a vehicle in New Jersey this past weekend when he collided with another vehicle coming toward him, according to usmagazine.com. The rapper was cited for driving without a license, driving without insurance and failing to provide a valid registration card. He's still in the hospital recovering from a broken lea.

Films 8, 9 and 10

Vin Diesel assured fans Friday on his Facebook page that the "Fast and Furious" franchise will end on a trilogy, according to ew.com. "Universal has been so good to me and so trusting of the vision... they have been like family," Diesel wrote, "I promised the studio I would deliver one last Trilogy to end the saga." The eighth film in the franchise still has no director, but it has a release date of April 14, 2017, according to ew.com.

Book cover revealed

Shonda Rhimes is penning a memoir. and it might be the only thing she writes where someone doesn't die at the end. The creator of "Grey's Anatomy" and "Scandal" revealed the cover of her book on Monday to People magazine. The book, "Year of Yes," explores a year in the life of the showrunner during which she decided to say yes to everything. Do you think this book will be better or worse than Jim Carrey's "Yes Man"?
